Federal Bail Bonds

Federal bail bonds are probably the most serious and risky forms of bail bond.

When a federal crime is involved, it's going to cost you a huge amount of money to get someone out of jail.

This is primarily because the crime is so serious, and there is significant risk to the state if the prisoner is let out of jail, even for a short time.

How Do Federal Bail Bonds Differ from State Bail Bonds?

The major difference between federal and state bail bonds is that you should pay an extra 15% premium at the beginning of the bail bonds process.

This is for the extra risk that the bail bond agency will be taking by dealing with a federal case.

Often you'll also need a significant amount of collateral.

In federal cases, when bail is applied for, a hearing will be called where the co-signer of the bond will be asked to produce proof that sufficient collateral exists to cover the full amount of the bond.
